THE LIBRARY HAS MOVED

its fiction. In keeping with recent developments in post-truth America, the Library's nonfiction books have been moved to a new collection renamed fake or true fiction, located where the old fiction collection had been. The old fiction has also been completely replaced with a new name called alternative nonfiction. So if you're looking for a good science fiction story, for example, it will now be in the new history-of-the-future section of the Library, but if you're looking for a textbook, they're still in the save-yourself-some-money section.

Before there was fake news, there was old news

Historical news is not funny because it's historical. In fact, it doesn't need to be funny at all, just old. Alternatively, funny news doesn't need to be historical, although it could be. But in all alternative honesty, historical news still wouldn't need to be funny. In fact, alternatively, it just needs to be news even though there's nothing new about it.

The Library now has access to historical newspapers from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1786-) and the Philadelphia Inquirer (1860-). Newspapers with news when news was news and not something else.

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette “performed one of its initial acts of public service by printing the newly adopted Constitution of the United States in 1787. ...The Post-Gazette went on to offer leading coverage of the U.S. westward expansion into Ohio and the Northwest Territory, the political unrest leading to the U.S. Civil War, and the industrial revolution—from coal mining to the rise of the steel industry. Andrew Carnegie. Henry Clay Fricke. Andrew Mellon. H.J. Heinz. United States Steel Corp. The Homestead Steel Strike. The Pittsburgh Steelers. Carnegie-Mellon Library. And so much more.”

The Philadelphia Inquirer “known for its coverage of the American Civil War that was popular with readers on both sides; its published works by Charles Dickens and Edgar Allen Poe. ...From the ... start of the Civil War, to the assassination of civil rights advocate Octavius V. Catto over the right for Blacks to vote; from the flu pandemic of 1918 that killed 12,000 Philly residents in one month — and 675,000 in all nationwide — to the debut of a local dance show, American Bandstand in 1952, The Philadelphia Inquirer offers a regional perspective of an exceptionally unique mix of historical events as they unfolded.”

Dedicated to Chuck Finley, real close friend of the Library

Charles Finley, aka Chuck, has read a great many fake, aka true fiction collections (that's collections, not just books) that are made up of real nonfiction, aka non-fake nonfiction books, and he has read a substantial number of fake nonfiction collections as well, aka alternative nonfiction collections made up of made up fictions that have little to no basis in real, non-fake nonfiction.

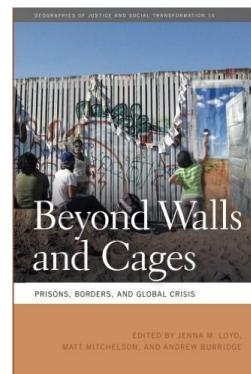

Select Book Reviews

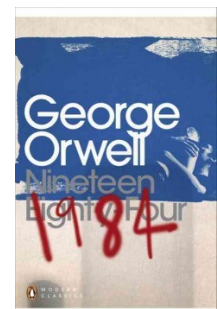

"Great documentary capturing the heroism of the Ford presidency. Two small thumbs up."

"Can't remember ... is fiction real or is it the made up one? Who cares ... I like the color."

"I never judged a book by its cover until I read this one. Hated it."

"1984 ... That was a good year. Van Halen ... Madonna ... Ghostbusters... 'Mem'rees ... like they're walled up in my mind"
